

PLUCK.

By Laura E. Richards.

"Y ES," said the ironmaster, "first honesty, and then pluck—those are the things needful. Speaking of pluck—do you know the summons of the telephone, said 'Yes' and 'No' by turns for five minutes, and then resumed."

"Speaking of pluck, as you were just now, remind me of a story, the beginning and end of which is that one word."

We settled ourselves in our chairs. We were sitting in the office of the iron works, and the air was full of the sound of great hammers, crashing and pounding, of the sharp hiss of molten metal, and the clear ring of smitten steel.

"I was sitting here in this very chair," the ironmaster began, "one day about seven years ago, or maybe eight. Time goes so fast I hardly try to keep count of it in these days. Any rate, here I was sitting, reading the newspaper, when there came a knock at the door."

"Come in!" I said; and in walked a stranger. He was a young man, about 25 years old, dressed like a gentleman, though his clothes had seen a good deal of service. Tall, with his head held up, and gray eyes that met mine fair and square.

"Always look first at a man's eyes, my boy! If he looks you in the eye, he is worth trying. If his eyes shift about here and there, as if they didn't know where to look, or were afraid of seeing something they didn't like—have nothing to do with him! That's my experience."

"Well, this young man came up to my desk, and spoke without waiting for me; yet it was no want of manners, for his manners were good."

"Good morning, sir," he said; and his voice had a clear ring to it that I liked. "I want work. Can you give me any?"

"I shook my head. We never took strangers in that way, and I don't recommend the practice at any time. 'No, sir!' I said. 'We have no work here. Sorry I can't accommodate you.' I took up my paper again, and looked to see him go out without more words, but he stood still. 'I must have work,' he said. 'I would try to give you satisfaction, sir, and I tell you I must have it!'"

"My good sir," I said, putting the paper down, "there is no vacancy in the place. If you will give me your name and references, I will make a note of them, and some day when we do have a job to dispose of I will remember you. That is the best I can do for you today."

"The young man shook his head. 'That won't do!' he said. 'Think again, sir. Surely in this great place there must be something a strong, willing man can do. It is useless to talk of waiting till a vacancy occurs. I must have work now, to-day! It is absolutely necessary!'"

"It was on the tip of my tongue to tell him that it was absolutely necessary for him to leave that office and shut the door after him; but I looked at him again, and didn't say it."

"I saw that he was telling the truth, and that he must have work. I wasn't that he looked shabby, or that there was any suspicion of whining or anything of the kind. If there had been, out he would have gone in pretty quick time. But there was a look in his eyes—well, I hardly know how to describe it, but the man was desperate, and had some reason for being so."

"What kind of work do you want?" I said, putting down the paper again. "Any kind?"

"You mean that?"

"I do. Anything that will put bread in the mouths of—" he choked a little, and stopped. Then, "I came from Canada two days ago, with my wife and three children, and was robbed in the train of my wallet. I have not a penny!"

"Come with me," I said. And he followed me out of the office. His story might be true, or it might not, but I had thought of a way to test the metal of which he was made.

"The Stark mill, in which I had some interest, had been partly burned a few days before, and I had a gang at work clearing away the rubbish. A dirty job it was; the men were up to their waists in dirt, and mud and water, and the whole place was a middle of rusty iron and burnt timbers and what-not—looked like the end of the world, and the worst end of that."

"The gang I had on were mostly Italians—it was too dirty work for a Yankee to touch, and even the Irish were shy of it. They were little, dark, monkey-looking fellows, working away, and chattering in their unearthly gibberish. I glanced from time to time at the man with his clear white skin, and hands which showed that, whatever trade he had worked at, clearing away wreckage hadn't been part of it. Though he looked like one who might have taken a good deal of exercise in athletic sports."

"Here is a job," I said. "The only one I know of. How do you like it?"

"Well enough," he said, as cool as possible.

"You'll get a dollar and a half a day," I told him. "You'll get your food, too, probably. When will you go to work?"

"In an hour," he said. Well, off he went, and I hardly expected to see him again. But before the hour was out he was back again, in a flannel undershirt and a pair of old trousers. He took his pluck, and down he went into that hole as if it was an evening party, sir.

"Well, I went back to the office. I couldn't be hanging round watching the men, or the boss would have been making trouble, but my new hand stayed on my mind, somehow, and I stroiled round by the creek two or three times in the afternoon, making some errand, you understand, in that direction."

"That man was working, sir, like a—like a house afire. The Italians are good workers, none better, as a rule—but he picked went in and out three times for their twice, and there was no chattering in his corner of the hole. He had little breath to talk, if he had wanted to, for though he was a human fellow, you could see with half an eye that he had never done such work in his life before."

"The next morning I was very lucky, and although I thought of my gentleman once or twice, I didn't manage to get down to the work till noon, soon after the whistle had blown for knocking off work."

"When I got there I saw the Italian lying round on the ground or squatting on the fence, eating their black bread and sausage, and chattering away as usual; but no sign of my gentleman in the flannel shirt."

"'Oh!' I said to myself. 'One day was enough for him, was it? And I thought it would have been enough for me, too. When you are not used to the swing of a pick, the way it takes you in the back is something beyond belief. I turned to come away, and lo! there he was, sitting off in a corner by himself, all crunched up, with a great bunch of bread in one hand and a book in the other.'

"I stroled up behind him and looked over his shoulder at the book. It was an Italian grammar, and he was looking at it as if it were a new book."

"My shadow falling on the book startled him, and he looked up. I suppose I must have looked as astonished as I felt, for he smiled and said: 'I couldn't afford to lose such an opportunity! The boss is very friendly, and I have learned several phrases. Buon giorno, signore!'"

"'Are you a schoolmaster?' I asked, and working down at that hole."

"'No,' he said, quietly. 'I am a bookkeeper. It is a great advantage for a bookkeeper to be able to read and answer foreign letters, and although I have some knowledge of French, I have never come to my way of translating spoken. So now is my chance. I got this grammar for 15 cents,' he added, turning it over, with a smile—the book was pretty ragged and one cover was gone—and I am getting on pretty well."

"Why in the name of a position as bookkeeper?" I asked, "instead of this kind of thing?"

"'Nobody will take a bookkeeper without references. I shouldn't think much of a firm that did, I suppose; he said, frowning. 'My references were in my wallet that was stolen and it has been a week and a half before I got new ones, as my native town is off the main lines and letters take a good while to get there. I've always been fond of open air and exercise, he added, with a quizzical look at the hole where he had been digging, and now I am getting lots of it.'

"'Black stuff,' I suggested.

"'So, said I, managing though often been worse after a day's working, and this is just as good bread as any other, and he took a bite out of his bunch and looked at his book as much as to say he had talked enough and wanted to be back at his grammar."

"I walked up to him and said to him: 'I'll come for his pay in the evening, stinky again, but smiling as if he had had an excursion down the harbor. So it went on till the fourth day. Every day I waited to see him give out his pluck, but he didn't, and I don't know how he would have worked in that hole and got stronger and stronger if something hadn't turned up."

"The fourth day I was sitting in the office, when the door opened and he came green, from the boiler works over the way. 'Morning!' he said. 'Do you know of a morning?' Our poor fellow had been sick for a long time yesterday. I have to think about getting another."

"I shook my head, but an idea came to me."

"'Will you take a man on trial?' I asked. 'What kind of a man?' asked Green. 'Well, I hardly know,' said I. 'I think he's a pretty good kind of fellow, only known him four days. I saw him over for his power of work, and I told the man's story.'

"Green went out with me, saw the young man, looked his back and nudged him in the spot. He blushed like a girl, and came out of his hole in the mud about half past five, and the next day found a home for the rest of his life."

"That is seven or eight years ago, and he has been at the boiler works ever since. If he's not to be made a partner soon I've been mistreated and treated badly. But that man, sir, he had the real article, and when a man has the real article, he is bound to work, don't you see? Well, good morning! Good luck to you in your new venture, and let your watchword be 'Pluck!'"

A PROMISE KEPT.

BY LAFACIO HEARN.

This story is taken from a volume of Japanese Miscellany recently published by Little, Brown Co. in English. The volume is of unusual interest and contains much of Japanese myths and traditions.

"I shall return in the early autumn," said Akana, a young man of about twenty years, as he bade good-bye to his brother, young Hasebe, who was to remain in the village of Kato, in the province of Harima. Akana was an Italian, and he wanted to visit his birthplace."

Hasebe said: "Your father—the Country of the Eight-Clouds—is very distant. Perhaps it will be difficult for you to promise to return here upon any particular day. But, if we were to know the exact day, we would feel happier. We could then prepare a feast of welcome and could wait at the gateway for your coming."

"Why, as for that," responded Akana, "I have been so much anxious to travel that I can hardly promise to return on any particular day. Suppose we say the day of the festival of Gion?"

"That is the ninth day of the ninth month," said Hasebe. "Then the day of the festival of Gion?"

"On the ninth day of the ninth month," repeated Akana, smiling. Then he strode away from the village of Kato, in the province of Harima, and Hasebe, Samon, and the mother of Hasebe looked after him with tears in their eyes."

"Neither the sun nor the moon," says an old Japanese proverb, "but the day of being one of the longest of all the days of the year." So the day of the festival of Gion was a day of great importance to the people of Kato, and Akana was the only one who had not returned."

And early upon the morning of the ninth day of the ninth month, Akana was ready to welcome his adopted brother. He had made a feast of good things, bought the vines of the above with chrysanthemums, and two bowls of rice, and he was waiting for his brother to arrive."

"The province of Harima," said Akana, "is more than 100 miles from this place, and the journey thence over the mountains is difficult and weary, and you must be sure that Akana will be able to come today. Would it not be better, before you take all this trouble, to wait for his coming?"

"For what?" said Hasebe. "I thought he would give out after the first day, didn't he? He couldn't break a promise! And if he were to see us beginning to make preparations after his arrival he would know that we had waited for him, and we should be glad to see him."

"The day was beautiful, the sky without a cloud and the air so pure that the world seemed to be a model of perfection. In the morning many travelers were seen passing through the village—some of them men, and some women, and some children, and some old people, and some young people, and some of them were carrying bundles on their backs, and some were carrying baskets on their heads, and some were carrying boxes on their hands, and some were carrying bags on their feet, and some were carrying everything they
